Children's Mental Health Treatment

The purpose of children's mental health treatment is to remedy or lessen the severity of emotional, social and/or behavioural problems of a child or youth in the context of his/her family, culture and community. Accredited children's mental health centres provide assessment and treatment services. Children's mental health centres have qualified professional staff and an infrastructure, including a clinical supervision system, that supports their delivery of children's mental health treatment.

Children's mental health treatment includes a series of planned, interrelated interventions based on an assessment of the multiple factors that might have produced or are maintaining the problem(s). Treatment includes planning, implementation, review, and case closure. The term "treatment" is used in a broad sense, and covers a range of interventions including early intervention, time limited interventions and longer term treatment approaches. In the CMHO accreditation Program Standards, the term "Intervention/Treatment" is most often used to convey this range of interventions.

Prevention

Prevention¹ seeks to avert mental health problems through interventions. These interventions include activities geared toward reducing factors leading to mental health problems; activities involving the early detection of, and intervention in, the potential development or occurrence of a health problem; and activities focusing on the treatment of health problems and the prevention of further deterioration and recurrence. Prevention can be universal or targeted. Universal prevention programs are applicable to whole populations such as elementary schoolaged children, while targeted programs are delivered to a specific population at increased risk of developing mental health problems (e.g., parenting groups for teenage mothers). The prevention program standards apply to both types of prevention programs. In addition, group services standards apply to targeted prevention programs.
